

Sports & Outdoors

Wednesday, June 18, 2014

541-469-3123 • news@CurryPilot.com

Pistol River Wave Bash

World's best compete at Pistol River

By Ryan Sparks

Pilot staff writer

The Wild Rivers Coast is known for its blustering winds, challenging ocean conditions, and the hospitality of its people; making the area prime real estate for the best windsurfers from around the globe to compete in the American Windsurfing Tour's fifth annual Pistol River Wave Bash held in Gold Beach last week.

"I love coming back here because the atmosphere is good, the sailing is good, and it's a beautiful location," said eight-time windsurfing world champion Kevin Pritchard, who has competed all around the world during his decorated 15-year career.

Levi Siver, the 2012 Wave Bash winner in the pro division, won the event for a second time, outdueling Pritchard, current AWT world champion Marcilio Browne, and last year's Wave Bash winner Camille Juban in the final heat to take home this year's title.

"In the final, I didn't feel like my jumps were as strong as they could be but my waves scores were just enough (to get the win)," said the 33-year-old pro who has been windsurfing for 24 years. "It's just a special feeling. Pistol River has challenging conditions. The conditions are changing with the waves and the wind and you always have to be prepared to adapt. It's wild."

Taking home the women's crown was Quebec's Ingrid Larouche, who has now won the event every year since its inception, though she admits that this year has been tougher than most due to a recent injury.

"I would say I was about 70 percent," said the three-time women's champion who recently recovered from a broken right foot to a high-ankle sprain and two broken metatarsals. She has been back on the water for only one week prior to the event. "I was surprised to win because the girls have really been stepping it up. The girls are all solid." Larouche, who makes her home in Hood River, admits that the injury had shaken her psyche.

"With the injury I didn't really have my confidence up so for me to go hit the lip and do the more radical stuff is scary. I did push myself to do forwards for the heat and it's a scary thing because I injured myself doing a back loop, but I knew I needed some jump to be competitive at all so I had to push myself," she said.

Pro division winner Levi Siver launches into the air during the 2014 Pistol River Wave Bash near Gold Beach last week. For Siver, it's the second time he has won the Pistol River event, previously winning in 2012.

Larouche pushed through the injury to land a flawless forward loop that helped her secure her fifth straight Wave Bash title, outdueling young upstart Fiona Wyldie for the second consecutive year.

"I came into this event just hoping to pick up a few points to stay competitive in the tour and I didn't expect to win because the girls have really been stepping it up," commented Larouche on her victory. "Today I just think I put the injury in the back of my head and tried to have fun and be as competitive as I could."

17-year-old Casey Rehner won the amateur title as well as taking home a second-place trophy in the youth division.

"I turned around on a good wave with about five seconds left (in the heat) and had a really good run and thought it could be a really good score," said the Maui native who is mentored by his godfather and former world champion Josh Stone. "You can't panic out there. You have to wait for a set or do a jump and get in what you haven't done. I was lucky to find that wave."

Ingrid Larouche won the Pistol River Wave Bash Women's division for an unprecedented fifth straight year despite recently recovering from a serious foot injury.

In the youth division, 14-year-old Loick Lesauvage, rode comfortably in the blustery winds and performed some gigantic back loops to take the top spot on the podium over Rehner and Harley Stone. Lesauvage said the weather was similar to the conditions he rides in while practicing in his home country.

"I'm happy and pretty stoked about winning," said Lesauvage through an interpreter. "Pistol River is pretty similar to where I sail in France. It took less time for me to get used to the conditions so it made it easier to get comfortable."

Canada's Dan Thompson won the Masters event by landing a clean loop in the over 30-knot winds. Dana Miller won the Grand Master division over second-place Colby Deer and third-place James Lundin.

Being the second leg of the six event tour, the Pistol River Wave up and shares some sessions together. "Pistol is awesome," declared Larouche. "Pistol is known to have really strong winds and the jumping is amazing. For wave riding it's little harder because of the direction of the wind being more offshore. It demands a different technique, but this event is challenging and cool."

The prime conditions are not the only reason the AWT keeps coming back. The tour began in 2009 with Pistol River being the only event on the tour. Now, five years later, the tour has grown and expanded to include more exotic locations such as Baja, Mexico, Peru and Maui, but the AWT is less about chasing the money and more about finding the perfect spots and perfect conditions for the sport of windsurfing. Thus, according to Bittner, Pistol River will always be an AWT destination. Though they had no title sponsor for this year's event, there was no chance of cancellation.

"I just feel like I'm passionate about making these events happen and I'm not going to let anything stand in our way," said Bittner regarding the tour's dedication to having an event on the Wild Rivers Coast. "People appreciate the events when they happen so it's worth it to me to have the events just to see people and families come together and enjoy the event."

Bittner also explains that Gold Beach and the local community has always supported the Wave Bash and her, and many of her fellow windsurfers, feel a connection to the area.

"It is really nice to have the community support for the event," she explains, stating that many local entities, such as the Beachcomber Inn and Curry County Fairgrounds to name a few, welcome them with open arms. "It's definitely unique and special."

For Siver, the area reminds him of home.

"I'm a country boy at heart. I love country," he admitted. "I'm originally from Sun Valley, Idaho, so I know this style of living: small town, good people, good value system. The people are so nice to us every year and I love coming here, for sure."

Gauging the response of the community, the feeling is mutual.

Windsurfers prepare and strategize over how to best tackle the strong winds and unforgiving conditions. Wind speeds reached 30-40 knots during the competition.

Though the windsurfers were unable to compete the first day due to low wind conditions, gusts picked up the following day and continued throughout the event.